CHAPTER III

On Quiet Hours

There is a particular quiet that belongs to a reading room in the late afternoon. The lamps are lit a little before they are needed, the tall windows turn the color of weak tea, and every reader seems to lean an inch closer to the page. Nobody speaks above a whisper, yet the room is never truly silent: a chair creaks, a page turns, a pencil scratches a small note into a margin.

A student learns, in rooms like these, that study is less a single bright moment than a long habit of returning. You read a difficult passage once and understand almost nothing. You read it again the next morning and one sentence opens like a door. By the end of the week the whole chapter has become a place you know your way around, with its own corners and its own light.

Keep a notebook beside the book. Copy out the lines that stop you, and write down the questions you cannot answer yet, because the questions are often worth more than the answers. Date every page. Years later your handwriting will tell you who you were when you first met an idea, and how far you have walked since.

And when the lamps go out and the doors are locked for the night, carry one thought home with you, folded small like a ticket in a coat pocket. It will keep. Good thoughts always do.
